Charlie Barton 'Ganymede'

Charlie Barton's chosen subject is the cosmos – celestial objects, nebulae, interstellar dust – her inspiration coming from her interest in "life force" and the question "at what point does life begin and cease in all living matter?" And it is just this sense of passionate engagement which gives to her ecstatic depictions of apparently dead worlds and unimaginably huge galaxies something that goes right to the heart of our fascination with them. Her images of moons such as Ganymede and Artemis are, as Rick Stroud, author of The Book of the Moon, has nicely observed "not what you see through a telescope, hers is the moon that, if you are lucky, you will glimpse in the dark recesses of your imagination."
